

The 22nd International Chopin Piano Competition in ASIA – Final Round

Solo Artist Category

I do totally understand and appreciate the idea of the Competition Organisers, who ensure that one of the main aims of the Competition is to provide pedagogical assistance to young pianists.

Of course, it is much more difficult, and sometimes even impossible, to express one's impressions or suggestions in a fully responsible manner, when one does not have the opportunity to have direct contact with the talent and artistic personality of the young pianist. That is why I decided to write these few general sentences of my thoughts, which concern practically all groups-categories that are part of the Competition Chopin in ASIA.

One of my frequent impressions when listening to Competition recordings was the impression of poorly defined or even non-existent artistic personalities of some pianists. On the other hand, a strong concentration on the exact execution of all the notes and the pedagogue's instructions is often evident. Unfortunately, we often do not hear a free, flexible, creative transmission of the pianist's interpretation. Then, we hear only an accurate but unfortunately often very mechanical realization of the text of the piece, too often subjected to the pressure of the rhythmic, metronomic tempo. Such a way of playing and music understanding guarantees limited development of the artistic personality of a young pianist and development of his musical imagination and a deep understanding of music.

What is completely different is the playing of a young pianist during everyday practice. Then an important source of information - but only information - may be the metronome. However, it is a complete misunderstanding if during a concert or a recording, instead of a narrative phrase we feel and hear... a metronome! We hear all the notes, pauses, accents etc. written in the score, but we do not hear the understanding of their role in the whole musical narration of the piece.

Such mechanical execution of the score are particularly irritating in the interpretation of deeply narrative Chopin's works.

Of course I understand perfectly well the fundamental differences in problems that the youngest pianists have, different from pianists from secondary schools and those who are already students of music universities. But in each of these groups - while maintaining obvious differences in the level of skills - the freedom of natural, creative expression and the joy of contact with music should be audible and visible! I particularly underline the term "natural transmission", and not a transmission based on artificially learned external, sometimes even theatrical gestures and movements, which are supposed to suggest understanding of the musical narrative.

Another, quite common problem is the proper understanding of what is the so-called expression in music and passion in playing. Unfortunately, very often we encounter interpretations of young pianists, whose performer understands and conveys to the audience the suggestion that expression is closely related to the fast tempo and dynamics of playing!

In my opinion, this is one of the fundamental musical errors and interpretive misunderstandings! I believe that tempo and dynamics are not the source of musical expression - on the contrary, the source of expression is and should be our mind, truly deep imagination and the artistic personality of the pianist, while the tempo and dynamics of interpretation are only the result of an extremely necessary imagination.

Finally, it is artistic imagination and the ability to communicate it to the audience - such an understanding of pianistic problems, which allows us to distinguish even good pianists from truly creative great artists.

And I wish to all our young pianists to look for and to use such an understanding of music and problems of interpretation!

Proportions and harmony are the most important elements of beauty – when performing music, everybody should look for this. Meanwhile, young performers very often would like to show their own ideas, their liberty which brings exaggeration and make musical form not clear. On the other hand, one can observe neutral performances which are formally correct but expression-deficient which makes listeners bored with lack of emotions.

I wish all young performers to look for good balance between those elements because only simplicity assures beautiful performance which could keep audience guessing.

Dear Participants,

I would like to congratulate all of you. I find many of the recordings very mature and professional, with good understanding of Chopin's style. I think that for all of us, one of the most important elements which helps us improve our skills is good balance e.g. balance between playing rubato and playing with simplicity, balance when choosing repertoire which is adequate to the technical abilities we have, balance between focusing on all the little details and embracing the piece as a cohesive whole, or balance between playing with great expression and controlling precise articulation and sound quality.

I wish all of you great satisfaction in playing Chopin's music, discovering new pieces and sharing all the emotions that are hidden in the immense piano literature.
